A STUDY OF EARS.

THE HUMAN EAR AND THE TALE IT TELLS TO THE OBSERVER.

pendage of the Head That Is Too Often Neglected as a Feature in the Delineation of Character.

Did any one ever go to any of the theaters when the house was crowded and amuse himself or herself studying the ears of the audience? It will pay the observing man to do so. He will realize then that there are cars and cars; those which indicate character in its several degrees, individuality, firmness, resolution, kindness and its antithesis, and the various other attributes which go to make up the widely varying specimens of humanity. A study of ears may not be entirely satisfactory. One is apt to find upon somebody else with whom he is not desperately in love a pair of auricular appendages which resuind him forcibly of is rather an odd thing that the majority physician, Dr. I. M. Ridge, and he dethose he sees when facing his mirror. It of men and women, however, seldom see their own ears. They can do so readily with the aid of a quick silvered glass, but the vanity of human nature seems to stop at the features of the face. the young man with theater tickets in for the Scribner and Stodhardt editions his pocket waiting an hour while she in the cheapest binding-has been a bar adjusts her eyebrows and gets just the to its popular use. right complexion on her cheeks, but the ears are left to take care of themselves. A wet rag is pushed hastily through their intricacies and they have had their share of attention. There are exceptions, of course, The woman who knows this reprint is not an abridgement, that her ears are lovely and bound to atmalformation. They can't help seeing their ears-neither can any one else. A REMARKABLE PAIR OF EARS.

It was at Hooley's the other night that a study was made of the eccentricity of the set complete on small easy pay the ear. The auditorium was crowded ments. and the jokes of the comedian emptied into a thousand tympanic cavities. What cavities some of them were too! There was a man with a hole in his ear which looked as though it might have been one of the nine mouths of the Mississippi. One would have thought a steamer could sent free on application. pass through it without sticking, and as for the flies and earwigs, a large colony of them could have habitated there all winter and hardly have been felt. Because the cavity was large it must not be supposed that the owner of the ear was proportionately so; to the contrary, this cavity was the biggest part of him. He was a little fellow; the ideal of a henpecked husband. The loudly developed channel of sound suggested the probability of his being accustomed to hear frequent commands to "go and Agent for Palst Brewing Co. TRAIN ORDERS. light the fire," or "get up and give the baby paregoric." He seemed to b this time, for he was alone, and there were no such discordant sounds to offend WILLIAM BREWING COMPANY, Call for Passengers in nis hearing.

Near him was a man who had a de cided inclination to obesity. He was tall, too, and could have easily tipped the beam at 200 pounds. Now, one would have supposed that his auricular members would have been developed equally with the rest of his anatomy. One would have been disappointed, however. They were almost midgets alongside of those belonging to the little man, and looked as though they might have received a shock in childhood from which they had never recovered. But in wite of their diminutiveness there was a great deal of don't-careness about them-an independence as to what they heard and what they didn't hear. A wife might nave yelled fire and baby and paregoric ONYX PAINT SHOP at these ears all night and they would never have heard it; they were not constructed after that fashion.

Alongside of him sat a woman who ONYX, MARBLE AND GRAINED MANTELS was evidently the wife. Her ears were long, irregular and stood out from the side of her head like the dust guards in a sleeping car. They were ears which, it could be plainly seen, were accustomed to being on the alert for some familiar at the Shop, next to Dublin Corral. There was a startled appearance about them which indicated that this voice was in the habit of greeting them with a command or a reprimand more than anything else. Evidently but few words of affection or endearment had passed through them.

in the row of seats just behind this queenly, interesting trio was a perfect symphony of ears. They were not the ears of men, but of women-pretty young women, with elaborately rich dresses and aristocratic faces. Indeed, these were patrician ears, and the blue blood could almost be seen coursing through them.

The girl who sat next to the end had the prettiest ears of all. They were beauties. Moderately small, regularly formed, sloping off into an oval at the lobe, and thin almost to transparency. There was a pinky tinge about them which was ample apology for the poets who sing about coral ears. They stood out from the head at almost an exact angle. They were perfect in every particular, but they were not responsive ears. They were accustomed to hear ing sweet nothings said, and simply listening for more. They said plainly that their owner was one wrapped up in the contemplation of her own charms, and expected all others to be equally so, and to make it known in words. Looking at those ears one would have described her as follows: Deep blue eyes, nose inclined to Roman, red lips, white teeth, clear complexion, little animation in the face. The description would have been entirely correct.-Chicago Tribune.

Venom of the Cobra.

A vivid notion of the intensity of a cobra's venom is given by the experience of Dr. Francis T. Buckland. He put a rat into a cage with a snake of that spe-cies, and it was killed after a plucky fight. Upon examining the skin of the dead rat immediately afterward he found two very minute punctures, like small needle holes, where the fangs of the cobra had entered. The fiesh seemed already to have actually mortified in the neighborhood of the wound. Anxious to find out if the skin was affected, Dr.
